Ose of those stories, so prolific in the West—romantie in the extreme, full of love, jealousy, attempted murder and a happy finale—has just been made public in Denver, Col. The hero, William Samuels, is one of the wealthiest men in the State, and it is f. om his lips that the story comes, corroborated by his wife and brother James. Four years ago the two brothers lived in the beautiful Chester Valley, Pennsylvania. Herbert Samuels, the father, was a well-to-do farmer, owning a splendid tract of land where he dwelt with his wife and two boys. When the latter were old enough he sent them to school and then to college. During their absence a brother of lege. During their absence a brother of the father died and he took into his family the dead man's child Hattie. When the two brothers returned from colty-five respectively, they found their cousin, a beautiful girl of twenty years, installed in the house. Of the brothers James, the elder, had light hair and eyes and was of quiet and even demeanor, rarely, if ever, known to be angry, and being a general favorite not only at home but throughout the entire community. In marked contrast was the character and disposition of William, the younger brother, who, of a dark, almost swarthy complexion, with hair and eyes as black as coal, was fiery and quick to anger, and although naturally well meaning had had numerous encounters, both while attending school and since his graduation.

Since the time, three years ago, when James and William finally returned from college and found their lovely cousin domiciled at their home, they had both been violently in love with her and both had made every manifestation of the feeling, but so far the cunning witch had avoided showing the slightest pref-erence for either, treating them as brothcrence for either, treating them as brothers rather than lovers. This state of affairs rankled as a thorn in the breast of the hot headed William, whose feelings of bitterness and jealousy toward his brother grew until they amounted to almost positive hatred. Time and again he sought quarrels, but James' more even temper prevented anything of a serious character until one bright afternoon in July, when, upon the return of the elder brother and Hattle from a ride, the younger, who watched with a feroclous, dangerous glare in his eyes as his brother assisted his cousin to alight, then foler assisted his cousin to alight, then followed him to the barn where he was unharnessing the horses and attacked him with the vilest abuse, using epithets so strong that he was at last compelled to seply in the same spirit.

Words were followed by blows, when William, blinded by passion, seized a heavy wagon spoke and dealt his brother heavy wagon spoke and dealt his brother a stunning blow, felling him to the earth, as the blood gushed from a ghastly wound in the head. At once realizing the terrible this 7 that he had done, and believing that I had killed his brother, a complete revulsion of feeling came over him, and, casting a last hursted liok at the prostrate form and the white upturned face, he fied. After several days of continuous travel he arrived at an obscure winning came in Colorado. an obscure taining came in Colorado, hoping that, buried in the wild fastnesses of the Rocky Mountains, he could shut out from his vision the ever present horrible sight of the face of the brother slair by his hand. Entering upon the ut sait of a miner he sought by a feverish industry and the hardest kind of hard word to forget his one horror, but in the dark recesses of the drift in which he was working in the alcony, corners in the dark recesses of the drift in which he was working, in the gloomy corners of the cabin in which he slept, everywhere and always it haunted him. In the meantime, after a few months, fortune with her usual fickleness rewarded his labor, which had been performed without any particular thought or hope of result, and the open drift which had become a tunnel of some proportions, struck a rich lead of marvelous proportions and containing immense wealth.

At once the almost unknown camp became famous, and his name all un-became famous, and his name all un-consciously to him became almost as a consciously to him became almost as a household word in all mining communi-ties as associated with one of the largest strikes of the year. Fame of this kind travels far, and even after a time reached the quiet farm in Chester Valley where he had spent his happy childhood days and afterward wrecked his manhood. One day, while in the cage ascending from the bottom of one of his deepest from the bottom of one of his deepest shafts, a shadow cast over the top caused him to suddenly look up, and the face he saw caused a thrill of horror to pass through him, his hands relaxed his grasp of the rope, and he had a narrow escape from falling to the bottom. Arriving at the top more dead than alive, he gave one hasty, frightened glance around him, saw the face again and swooned away. The owner of the and swooned away. The owner of the face, a tall and handsome man, evidently face, a tall and handsome man, evidently a stranger in the camp, sprang forward and caught his falling body in time to prevent it from being dashed to piecea in the bottom of the shaft, at the same time ejaculating, "Ob, William!" The miner was taken to his cabin, and, after the spplication of restoratives, slowly ravived. "Where is it?" he asked, at which the atranger slowly advanced and said softly, "Brother, don't you know me?" With a still half frightened look in his wandering eyes, the miner gazed which the stranger slowly advanced and said softly, "Brother, don't you know me?" With a still half frightened look in his wandering eyes, the miner gazed again at the face which had so startled him, and gradually realizing the fact that it was real, living fiesh and blood again relapsed into a swoon. For days he raved in the paroxysms of a fover, living the hideous chapter of his life over again, until at hist the favor exhausted itself by its very force, and the sick man sank into a deep slumber.

At last the invalid awwke, weak and helpless as a child, but in his right mind. Instantly the cause of his illness was by his side, and taking his hand tenderly in his own said, "William, my poor brother "It was James Samuels, the brother who was supposed to have been dead, but who was here alive and well and in the full enjoyment of manhood, "Is the a miracle?" ejaculated William, as soon as he could speak. "It is no miracle, but ared mistake under which you have indoubtedly suffered much. When you get stronger I will tell you all." The next day, William having so far recovered as to be able to sit up, his brother sat by him and said: "Notwithstanding my njury, which was not nearly so zerious as you imagined, I regained consciousness shortly afterward, and our father, who entered the barn at that moment, assisted me to the house. The news was broken to your mother and Hattis as gently as possible and I realiy think their sympathles were with you more than with me. The matter was kept as quiet as possible in the neighborhood, and I sam recovered from the injury, and everything went along as amal save that you were gric—d for and inmented by all. Notwithstanding all the inquiries which we had quietly set on foot to discover your whore and nourned you almost as one dead. About the weeks age I picked up an old newspaper and saw your name for the first the inquiries which we had quietly set on foot to discover your whore and nourned you almost as one dead. About the weeks age I picked up an old newspaper and saw your na you." A dazed look came over William's face, and gasping, "It cannot be," he very neary relapsed into another swoon, the joy of the amount of the swoon, the joy of the announcement being almost too much for him in his weakened state. At last, after having been assured again and again by his brother of the glad truth, he exclaimed, "Oh, let us go home at once," Arrangements were made at once to start, and with a new life in his veins the invalid recovered his strength so rapidly that they left the camp on the second day efter and his strength so rapidly that they left the camp on the second day after, and reached home inside of a week. Of the meeting and its joys words could not give an accurate description. A quict wedding followed within one short month, after which the miner returned with his bride to Colorado, furnished her a magnificent home in Denver, and is now not only one of the wealthiest but one of the most honored residents of the Queen City .- New York Telegram. "Let me see you write."

He had tried some of them, and found them wanting. An ancedote told by the Hon. Olive: H. Smith, of Indiana, illus-Artesian wells are boles, of small diameter, sunk to a great distance in the earth, from which currents of water rise towards the surface and sometimes flow over in a strong stream. Water thus forced up must be subject to great pressure, and it must have its source in a more elevated region than where the well is bored and it must be confirmed between impermeable strata of rock which will act as a pipe. These wells are called Artesian from Artols, a province of France, where they first attracted public attention. The old Roman name of the province was Artesiam. We have in this country bored wells of shallow depth which are not Artesian. They are the common wells that stop at the first warcommon wells that stop at the first war-ter-bearing stratum reached. To get a good flow of water, a sub rranean foun-tain must be struck which comes from "A fine-looking young man called upon me one day, desiring to study law with me. I inquired of him as to his education. an elevated region and which is confined by strata above and below, through which water cannot pass. The first well of this sort was bored by some Domini-can monks at the town of Lilliers in "I am a graduate of an Eastern col-lege,' said he. 'I understand Latin, Greek and Hebrew; I stood number two in a large class."
"'Do you spell well?"
"'I presume so, but I never thought much of that." France in the 12th century. This is said to be nearly dry at this date. Much depends on the dip of the stratum bearing the water. A constant channel, or ing the water. A constant channel, or stream is necessary in order to keep up the supply. The source of water in our ordinary wells is generally higher than their locations but they never overflow. Water is not forced up because the stratum through which the water passes acts as a sponge and not as a pipe.

small one, that runs with little force because the pressure is wanting.

The temperature of the water in the same well never varies, but it increases in proportion to the depth of the well. At Paris the mean temperature is 51. The well at Grenelle, 1,797 feet deep, is 82, or an increase of one degree for every 58 feet. At St. Louis the increase is one degree for every 83 feet. At Charleston the increase is one degree for ever 53 feet. If this increase is gradual as we descend, boiling water would be brought up from a depth of three miles.

The wells of France, London, Germany and the Mississippi Valley are all in the tertiary formations and the strata of clays, sands and limestones are admirably arranged for furnishing water by means of these wells. These districts are basin shaped and the water would naturally flow to them from the higher naturally flow to them from the higher levels. It has generally been supposed that in the primary, or Eozoic formation of the earth, that Artesian wells would be very difficult to get. There is would be very difficult to get. There is no doubt as to striking water-bearing strate, but whether streams with sufficient headway to force water to the surface will be reached is amongst the unknown problems. Should the well at Atlanta prove a success and afford a large quantity of water, the opinions of many persons will have to be modified and there will be a revolution in obtainand there will be a revolution in obtain- signature was wanted on a certain paper and there will be a revolution in obtaining the water supply for our cities. If it is demonstrated that Artesian wells, with a large and strong flow of water can be secured, it will be worth much to the towns and cities in our Piedmont beit.

The yield of these wells differs very much and so does the force with which the water comes to the surface. The famous Grenelle well was begun in 1833. At 1500 feet the government would have abandoned the project if it had not been for M. Arago. It was continued until 1841, when at the depth of 1,797 feet the drill sudddenly fell 14 feet and the water rushed forth. So great was the flow that it was checked by raising a vertical pipe many feet into the air. It was thus remany feet into the air. It was thus reduced from 440 to 135 gallons per min-ute. Its uniform temperature is 82 and the water is used for warming hospitals. At Passy, two miles from Grenelle, another well was sunk, which evidently draws its supply of water from the same source. A wonderful change has been produced in the desert of Sahara, by these well. The first one was sunk in 1858, which furnished a steady stream of water having a temperature of 61. of water having a temperature of 61, which is about the average of the ordinary wells of this section of country. Up to 1872 75 of these wells had been sunk, the water being reached at a slight danth. sunk, the water being reached at a slight depth. Thousands of palm trees are now growing where once the desert sands drifted, and beautiful gardens are blooming in the midst of the wilderness. At Bourne, England, there is a well only 92 feet deep the furnishes 557,000 gallons of pure water per day.

The proprietors of the Continental hotel in Philadelphia have a well 200 feet deep which supplies them with 50,000 gallons of water daily. The wells of St. Louis, Louisville and Charleston are famous on account of the difficulties

St. Louis, Louisville and Charleston are famous on account of the difficulties attending the work. The first St. Louis well was begun in 1849. The boring was continued under great dfficulties. In 1854 water was reached at the depth of 2,199 feet, which is discharged at the rate of 75 gallons per minute. The water is mineral and fit only for medicinal purposes. The well at Louisville is 2,086 feet deep and flows at the rate of 330,000 gallons a day with a force equal to 10 horse power.

The greatest difficulties have been en-countered in boring the first Charleston well. Since 1824 efforts have been made countered in boring the first Charleston well. Since 1824 efforts have been made to secure a supply of water in this way, and in 1848 Major Welton began the well which has become famous. The sand flowed in and the well had to be lined with tubing. The sand would rush in and fill the well over a hundred feet deep in one night. At the depth of 1,020 feet it was found necessary to take on the light inding used and replace it with heavier. Water was finally reached at 1,250 feet the discharge, 10 feet above the surface, being 1,200 gallons an hour. The water is asline, disagreeable to the taste and has a temperature of 87. Horses become very fond of it and will drink it in preference to all other water.

In Troquois county, Illinois, there are some remarkable walls. There are 200 of these in a radius of 20 miles and the average depth does not exceed 70 feet. The daily yield of these wells has been estimated at over 50 millions of gallons a day. Their situation is 62 fast above lake Michigan and their nearest possible source is 200 miles sway. These are all flowing wells. In New York there is a number of these wells.

Of course when you come to the first Artesian wells they are to be found in Ohina. The missionary Joshort, stated in 1827 that these wells were to be found by tems of thousands. Some of them and been carried down to a depth of 8,000 feet.
